Abstract

Black American humanitarianism touched the four corners of the Earth. Frederick Douglass publicly criticized "Yellow Peril" propaganda and the Chinese Exclusion Act, an early testament to universal justice. From opposition to Japanese internment and U.S. colonial rule to the foundation of the Black Panther Party—which inspired movements on four continents—Black Americans championed the vulnerable around the world. The 761st and 784th Tank Battalions liberated Holocaust victims. Civil rights activists spearheaded the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, formed alliances with the American Indian Movement, and labor leader Cesar Chavez. Black Americans protested Japanese internment, the Vietnam War, the Philippine-American War, and the United States of America's colonial rule in the Philippines. Freedom House Ambulance Service launched the first paramedic care in America. Strategic boycotts and mass protest accelerated the fall of South African apartheid. Advocates confronted genocide, terrorism, and human rights abuses across the planet. Black American donations soared 25% above the national average. The Tuskegee Airmen, Buffalo Soldiers, Olympians, and iconic entertainers built a stellar global reputation—a legacy of conscience, sacrifice, and heroism.

Introduction

As the heartbeat of humanitarianism, the emancipated moved around obstacles on a tightrope. On the international stage, Black American philanthropy shone through schools, churches, and charitable concerts—We Are The World. The historic presence of elite segregated armed forces, united with iconic performances by Olympians, artists, and entertainers, built a stellar reputation across the planet.

Black Americans, the Heartbeat of Humanitarianism

Frederick Douglass publicly criticized “Yellow Peril” propaganda and the Chinese Exclusion Act experienced by scapegoated immigrants. Black Americans strongly opposed Japanese internment, the Vietnam War, the Philippine-American War, and the United States of America's colonial rule in the Philippines.

Inspired by a black panther symbol, liberation politics, and the concept of militant self-defense of the Lowndes County Freedom Organization, Alabama, Huey Percy Newton and Bobby Seale founded the Black Panther Party in Oakland, California, c. 1,966 CE. The concept globalized with the Dalit Panthers, Polynesian Panthers, and the Australian Black Panther Party.

Two hundred thousand protestors in major cities—New York, Chicago, and Detroit—protested in support of Ethiopia and fought against the Italian invasion of Ethiopia, c. 1,935 CE. John Charles Robinson, the “Brown Condor,” volunteered to fight Italian forces as a commander in the Ethiopian Air Force.

Near the end of World War 2, the 761st Tank Battalion liberated Gunskirchen, a subcamp of the Mauthausen concentration camp, c. 1,945 CE. The Black Panthers inspired the Israeli Black Panthers.

“We took 23 cities in three days,” recalled Baldwin, who fought with the U.S. Army’s all-black 784th Tank Battalion. “We were really moving. We were taking the cities [meaning killing Germans], and running them out. We came in and freed them. We liberated them. To know I had a role in the liberation of Holland means a lot.” -Corporal James W. Baldwin—awarded the certificate of appreciation from the Embassy of the Netherlands.

Black American civil rights activists championed the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1965, inspired the Brown Berets, the American Indian Movement, and endorsed the founder of the United Farm Workers—Cesar Chavez.

Peter Safar designed modern ambulances and EMS instruction. Black Americans from Freedom House, a charitable organization, trained to respond to choking, heart attacks, childbirth, and seizures. Freedom House Ambulance Service in Pittsburgh offered the first paramedic care in America, c. 1,967 CE.

The Congressional Black Caucus’ petitions, U.S. sanctions, mass protests, “Free Nelson Mandela” campaigns—music, attire, and books with strategic boycotts of apartheid-related companies led to the fall of apartheid.

Meetings, letters, and petitions addressed deportations, African trade deals, Caribbean disasters, police brutality/SARS, Boko Haram, institutionalized domestic violence, honor killings, child marriages, female genital mutilation/FGM, terrorism, starvation, and genocide. Black Americans objected to savage representations of Africans in cartoons, advertisements, cinema, television, and magazines—National Geographic and National Wildlife. Black Americans donated billions to charities, fundraisers, and concerts, 25% higher than average citizens. Foreigners of African descent and people of color benefit from Black American political systems, HBCUs, diversity programs, and scholarships.

Years later, the Five Civilized Tribes revoked citizenship from Freedmen. The League of United Latin American Citizens clashed with Black American civil rights activists. Chinese—Students for Fair Admissions sued institutions with the goal to challenge Black American attendance. NAACP leaders, Congressional Black Caucus members, HBCU faculty, and scholarship committees drifted away from Black Americans toward foreigners. Pan-Africans, CARICOM, and the African Union used centuries of Black American suffrage to demand reparations for the descendants of slave sellers. Africans generate wealth from slave memorials—castles, dungeons, doors of no return, and museums.

Conclusion

On the international stage, Black American philanthropy shone through schools, churches, and charitable concerts—We Are The World. The historic presence of elite segregated armed forces, united with iconic performances by Olympians, artists, and entertainers, built a stellar reputation across the planet.
